

Abstract

The present invention relates to arrays for bacterial gene expression profiling in response to treatment with antimicrobial compounds. Bacterial nucleic acid molecules are used as the hybridizable elements in various applications, such as arrays for gene expression profiling and for determining a mode of action for an antimicrobial compound. The present invention also relates to nucleic acid sequences which can be developed as targets for drug screening.